Excerpt: .Desert our animals, all hobbled, deserted us and went back many miles where we found them digging for water. On another occasion when on the way to Lee s Ferry, I spent a lonely day in camp, my driver having started off to fetch in his horses before breakfast, and following them for sixteen miles before they were caught. Had he not been an exceptionally desert-hardened man, that thirty-two miles--sixteen on foot and sixteen on a saddleless horse--would have so exhausted him as to render his return to where I was camped somewhat problematical. What then could I have done had he failed to return? On a road where water could be found only by the well informed, hidden away in secret tanks up tiny canyons, or under unmarked arroyo banks, no ordinary traveler can conceive the horrors of the situation. To walk in the intense heat without water is almost an impossibility. To carry provisions is to add to the difficulty, and yet to go without them equally impracticable. Then, too, it is disturbing, to say the least, to the peace of mind of the strongest-hearted to find himself in a strange place, uncertain as to the road, often where there is no road at all, --nothing but landmarks over a trackless desert, --short of water, and alone. No wonder that many men break down under it, grow confused, become delirious and finally perish in their aimless wanderings. Hence the emphasis of my...
