So, along the line, the advocates of the natural order of learning have believed that if we could organize method, if we knew the psychology of the child better, if we knew how the young child's awakening mind develops, we could know how to provide an environment by which the child's learning could be accomplished. As I have followed education in practice and education in theory for several years in connection with this problem it has seemed to me that in our American schools today and especially in the American grammar school and in the American primary school, more or less blindly and in a more or less fragmentary way, we are working out here, what I have called a new basis of method and that new basis of method represents in a way, but in a difficult way, a combination of the two extremes of method, which I have thus far described. I think any one of us can easily understand that that philosophy of education which rests largely on the logical organization of subject matter soon ceases to be effective, I think we have innumerable examples of that today right in our midst. For example, if we attempt today in our primary schools to teach reading by giving the first of the alphabet, we would surely do a logical thing, on the logic basis of reading. But primary teachers of today believe that by doing that we should stultify...
